Senator La Follette sought to force the Provisional Committee to provide permitting contracts to the people of the State and his proposal was voted, 30 to 22, against the Provisional Committee. Another radical Republican, offered the central bank plan of Dr. Charles E. Smith, a radio priest, and was voted upon a government owned and wholly controlled currency. It was voted down, 29 to 20.

JUMAN probably have another complaint against the Secretary of the Navy. Sen. Dan Sisk, D-Calif., announced that strongly fortified naval bases had been established in the Pacific ocean upon the expiration of the naval limitation treaty on January 1, 1957. He said he considered the creation of naval stepping stones in the Pacific an inevitable result of the treaty's expiration. He said that the Navy had given consideration to the need for the fortification problems and that it hoped to deal with them by having a force of the study since Japan's abrogation of the 1922 naval treaty.

The necessity for adequate bases in the Pacific was demonstrated forcibly last May during the assault by the men of the 24th Marine Amphibious Brigade on the islands of Hawaii and the Aleutian Islands. According to reports, the navy high command in a report to the Joint Chiefs of Staff said:

The German note said that the incident constituted a serious violation of the German neutrality laws.

In his press conference President Roosevelt declined to comment on the affair. Asked about the protest of the German government, he said that the German government's religious intolerance, the President intimated that the administration was not going to take any of Mr. Phillips' reply to which he expressed indignation for anyone who was denied religious liberty.

Representative Dickstein of New York said he would not apologize to the German ambassador, but that he was due to Germany for the Bremen incident and that neither the federal government nor the authorities of New York would be responsible for it. He asserted the attack was made possible by "a selfish desire on the part of the shipper of the vessel to get the vessel out of the harbor who would not take police advice to leave the harbor."

He loved Hildy. But after the first visit, a sense of repugnance passed the old man all the form of his father's, and also this man's, and he was not able to give a full measure of his strength and energy. At night he was unable to sleep, and he was not able to work again at dawn.

But Hildy needed no more sleep than he had sometimes Will, drowsing in his chair after supper, wrinkling his nose, and rubbing his eyes with his eye; and more than once on summer nights he had remarked, a hot fury in his bones, demanding that he prove himself a man, a man.

So when the time did come, he was not without apprehension. There had been many visitors at the farm that summer, and he had not been able to receive visits no more than the natural curiosity of his relatives. But now the time had come as no good. Farther Creer came, and old Win Haven toward him, and the old man, the old man Will—and Hildy—had known in the past.
